

I agree that year-round school is a good idea. We wouldn't be out all summer to forget schoolwork, we would have short breaks more often, and ~~no~~ <sup>we wouldn't have</sup> long, boring summers.

During the 3 month summer break, the majority of students put away the books and relax. This causes students to forget some of the important information from the previous year. A twelve-month school year would eliminate some of the needless review time teachers now use, because the students would remember more.

School can begin to get a little monotonous at times. With the year-round schedule, however, we would get short breaks more often. The school year would be ~~extended out~~ <sup>distributed evenly</sup> more than it is at the present time. Students wouldn't be off for almost 3 months then on for the other nine with hardly any breaks.

The twelve-month school year would eliminate the long, boring summer that we have now. Students stay so busy with school and other ~~extra~~ school related activities during the school year, but when summer comes around most school functions end as well. This ~~is~~ is a major adjustment that kids make. They begin to sleep late, lay around watching TV, and anything except studying or reading. If it uses the brain most students lock it up for the summer.

In conclusion, year-round school is definitely something an idea that would better our school system. There is no sense in letting three whole months go by with allowing students to put education in the back of their minds. The twelve-month school year would solve the problems of forgetting scholastics, boredom with school, and long breaks.
